

MAIN TOPICS

Contemporary architecture creates user-centred environments in which it is enjoyable to spend time: in particular, in hospitals these issues are important as much as the provision of treatment or support for those dealing with illness or trauma. The design of healthcare facilities requires a sensitive approach to minimise the sense of alienation and offers a welcoming and comfortable place for people for improving health through healing environments.

Nowadays, architectures for health are suffering not only from a lack of resources but also from a whole vision of hospital's needs. Therefore, the attention to topics like safety, environmental sustainability, comfort and well-being, requires a typological, structural and managerial re-organization of design process: for this reason, it is important to involve hospital planners and design teams for boosting innovative design strategies through highly experienced professionals and stimulating debate on these issues.
